

Patient advocacy groups

Turn community priorities into services people can use.

Your members' priorities can shape more than a message. They can inform the resource, service and evidence decisions an organisation makes.

IAE connects accessible preparation, purposeful involvement and practical service design so a contribution has somewhere useful to go.

A useful first output

An involvement brief and a clear account of what changes.

For the people you support

Adults living with a condition, families and carers can choose what to ask, how to participate and what they share.

Possible starting points

Accessible information and preparation

Begin with a recurring question. Develop one resource with a clear purpose, reliable sources and a useful next step.

Community-informed service design

Begin with one open decision. Prepare an involvement brief and a practical feedback-to-action record.

Service design and handbooks

Begin with one journey. Leave with a service map and a handbook module your team can put to work.

Evidence and publishing support

Begin with one resource or source collection. Establish the key changes, source register and review responsibilities.

These are suggested starting points, not eligibility rules. Explore all ten offers at iaeconsults.co.uk/working-together.html.

Prepare a useful first conversation

Use this sheet privately to shape a short outline. It is not an application, agreement or request for medical information.

Who is the work for?

Name the intended users and what they need to do. This keeps the output connected to a real task.

What is difficult now?

Describe one recurring question, handover or resource gap. An example helps define the work.

What would help first?

Choose a manageable output and how someone would use it. This prevents the brief becoming a list of activities.

Who should review and maintain it?

Identify the appropriate role and any format, language or timing needs. These shape the handover.

Leave out personal medical records and confidential case details. Keep or edit this on your device. Nothing is sent by downloading or completing this sheet.
