

Charities and foundations

Make the contribution count.

A service-delivery charity, research funder and foundation may need different kinds of support. Start with the contribution you are trying to make.

IAE can help turn a service need, evidence question or proposed partnership into a focused brief, sound decisions and manageable work.

A useful first output

A project brief linking intended benefit, output, responsibility and review.

For the people you support

The intended beneficiary stays visible in the brief: who should find the service easier to use, what should become clearer and how the organisation will find out.

Possible starting points

Focused community support

Send a few lines about one priority. Agree a manageable output, practical support and a clear handover.

Service design and handbooks

Begin with one journey. Leave with a service map and a handbook module your team can put to work.

Evidence and publishing support

Begin with one resource or source collection. Establish the key changes, source register and review responsibilities.

Resources, skills and connections

Begin with the gap. Create a support brief, resource shortlist or introduction plan that makes the next conversation more productive.

These are suggested starting points, not eligibility rules. Explore all ten offers at iaeconsults.co.uk/working-together.html.

Prepare a useful first conversation

Use this sheet privately to shape a short outline. It is not an application, agreement or request for medical information.

Who is the work for?

Name the intended users and what they need to do. This keeps the output connected to a real task.

What is difficult now?

Describe one recurring question, handover or resource gap. An example helps define the work.

What would help first?

Choose a manageable output and how someone would use it. This prevents the brief becoming a list of activities.

Who should review and maintain it?

Identify the appropriate role and any format, language or timing needs. These shape the handover.

Leave out personal medical records and confidential case details. Keep or edit this on your device. Nothing is sent by downloading or completing this sheet.
