

Evidence and publishing support

A source matters most when people can see what it supports—and what it does not.

IAE connects evidence judgement with practical publishing. The work may be a source review, staff handbook, educational guide or evidence brief. Its purpose, interpretation, ownership and review date travel with the content so the next edition has a clear basis.

A useful first output

Begin with one resource or source collection. Establish the key changes, source register and review responsibilities.

For the organisation

The organisation can trace a statement to its source, distinguish evidence from interpretation and maintain web, print and other agreed editions together.

For the people it supports

Readers can understand the basis of the information, find the relevant source and raise a correction. Clear limits support a more informed conversation.

Review the benefit

Check whether users can follow a claim to its source and whether a correction reaches affected editions.

Prepare a useful first conversation

Use this sheet privately to shape a short outline. It is not an application, agreement or request for medical information.

Who is the work for?

Name the intended users and what they need to do. This keeps the output connected to a real task.

What is difficult now?

Describe one recurring question, handover or resource gap. An example helps define the work.

What would help first?

Choose a manageable output and how someone would use it. This prevents the brief becoming a list of activities.

Who should review and maintain it?

Identify the appropriate role and any format, language or timing needs. These shape the handover.

Leave out personal medical records and confidential case details. Keep or edit this on your device. Nothing is sent by downloading or completing this sheet.
