

Resources, skills and connections

A precise request can make expertise easier to share.

IAE can help a small organisation or specialist team define a gap, find relevant resources and explore appropriate connections. A permissioned resource or focused skills brief may be more useful than starting another large programme. Introductions are explored with the people involved.

A useful first output

Begin with the gap. Create a support brief, resource shortlist or introduction plan that makes the next conversation more productive.

For the organisation

The organisation can explain the work, assess relevant experience and understand the rights and maintenance attached to a resource it reuses.

For the people it supports

The group can use the contribution to address a real need. Clear scope and a usable handover make support more likely to remain useful after the initial exchange.

Review the benefit

Track whether relevant help was actually agreed and whether the resulting output can be used.

What expertise, resource or connection would unlock your next step?

Explore the relevant IAE work and choose an enquiry route at iaeconsults.co.uk/working-together.html#offer-09

Prepare a useful first conversation

Use this sheet privately to shape a short outline. It is not an application, agreement or request for medical information.

Who is the work for?

Name the intended users and what they need to do. This keeps the output connected to a real task.

What is difficult now?

Describe one recurring question, handover or resource gap. An example helps define the work.

What would help first?

Choose a manageable output and how someone would use it. This prevents the brief becoming a list of activities.

Who should review and maintain it?

Identify the appropriate role and any format, language or timing needs. These shape the handover.

Leave out personal medical records and confidential case details. Keep or edit this on your device. Nothing is sent by downloading or completing this sheet.

Choose the appropriate contact route at iaeconsults.co.uk/working-together.html. Scope and arrangements are agreed before work begins.