

Independent ambassadors and advisers

A useful ambassador has a voice of their own.

People who connect with IAE's purpose can contribute as independent advisers, ambassadors or occasional collaborators. The value may be an honest challenge, a resource review, a relevant introduction or a question others have missed.

A useful first output

Discuss the perspective you would like to contribute. Agree whether you speak personally or for an organisation and how the role is described.

For the organisation

IAE gains a more grounded view of what is useful, what is missing and what should be reconsidered. A role has a purpose, agreed time and practical support.

For the people it supports

Contributors choose how they take part and retain their own voice. There is no promotion quota, required endorsement or expectation to share a medical story.

Review the benefit

Record what the contribution influenced and report back, including where a suggestion was not taken forward.

What would you like to help IAE see more clearly?

Explore the relevant IAE work and choose an enquiry route at iaeconsults.co.uk/working-together.html#offer-04

Prepare a useful first conversation

Use this sheet privately to shape a short outline. It is not an application, agreement or request for medical information.

Who is the work for?

Name the intended users and what they need to do. This keeps the output connected to a real task.

What is difficult now?

Describe one recurring question, handover or resource gap. An example helps define the work.

What would help first?

Choose a manageable output and how someone would use it. This prevents the brief becoming a list of activities.

Who should review and maintain it?

Identify the appropriate role and any format, language or timing needs. These shape the handover.

Leave out personal medical records and confidential case details. Keep or edit this on your device. Nothing is sent by downloading or completing this sheet.

Choose the appropriate contact route at iaeconsults.co.uk/working-together.html. Scope and arrangements are agreed before work begins.